Manufacturers are also working to ensure that their devices support the integration of the Healthcare Enterprise (HIE) radiation monitoring profile (HIE). CT Collaborations The FDA contributed to a standard in the sector, Computed Tomography Dose Check, published on 1 October 2010 by the National Electrical Manufacturers Association (NEMA). This standard defines the protections to prevent CT scanners from providing excessive radiation. Notifications and notices CT Dose Check recall the attention of the user on what high-dose settings could be and offer an opportunity to the user to confirm or modify the Scan settings before proceeding. The FDA continues to dialogue with the NEMA Medical Imaging and Technology Alliance (Mita) CT group on the development of a standard of access control, which establishes users' privileges, request the verification of the changes and changes of the tracks. Mita is also developing the guidelines for the information of user to identify the key components of the instructions for use recommended in the November 2010 letter of the FDA to Mita. The FDA has presented detailed proposals to the international maintenance team of the CT standards (IEC) of the International Electrotechnical Commission as regards the new functions of safe use, the automatic registration of the doses and the evaluation of the quality of the images.
